Cosmetology used to be a servants job, but today it's a skilled trade that people love doing. Cosmetology first started in ancient times and has come along way. People today still use the ancient ways like henna dye on the skin, hair dye, and extracting essential oils the same way from herbs. The Greeks and Romans started the spas we have today because they took steam baths to extract their pores just like we do today. The Romans created the first curly look by using something like a curling iron that was heated by a fire. However, cosmetology was mainly used in spiritual ways. Most women covered their hair and didn't wear makeup. Cosmetology was very popular in the 18th century with curly hair and natural looks along with bold looks by using a kohl pencil which is like eyeliner in today's times.

“Since the first time a human being was able to see his or her reflection in a body of water revealing that it was yet another “bad hair day”, there have been cosmetologists.”

The author wanted to explain how cosmetology changes with the current society. I think the article is important because it explains the way people thought of doing the things they did. Health is an important part of cosmetology and it has always been important to people. Cosmetology is all about looking your best because of the health of skin, hair, and even nails.
